A Word From the Publisher

While it is obvious that the Internet is changing the way people buy things, the question of how and when those things are delivered to customers remains one of the great logistical challenges of our time.

More than a decade after the dot-com boom and bust in the late 1990s and early 2000s, we're starting to see fundamental changes in how goods purchased online are distributed.

And the company at the center of the e-commerce revolution is Amazon.com.

The quintessential e-tailer, established in 1995 in Seattle to sell used books, is building out a network of local distribution centers to put goods in close proximity to most customers, enabling delivery of virtually any product to any address in the United States in two days or less.

Retailers, like Wal-Mart and Staples, have responded by offering same-day delivery for online orders and are fueling demand for what could become a huge new market for on-demand delivery services.

As Transport Topics' Senior Features Writer Daniel P. Bearth recently reported, UPS Strategic Enterprise Fund has invested $2 million in a British firm called Shufl that plans to launch same-day delivery service in 10 cities in the United States and Canada in 2013 using a network of local couriers.

Same-day delivery is "the next billion-dollar startup opportunity," said Matt Lynley in a blog post for Business Insider.com.

For the nation's top logistics companies, e-commerce represents a major opportunity for growth.

Many traditional retailers have separate supply chains for goods sold online and in stores, but that is beginning to change.

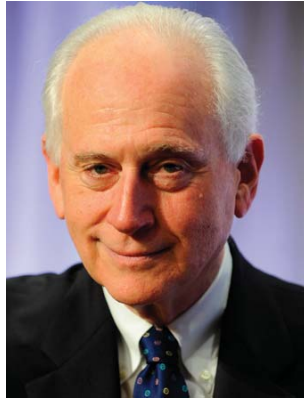

"We're in the early stages of seeing systems merged," said Patrick Kelleher, senior vice president of Exel in Westerville, Ohio.

Exel ranks No. 1 on the 2012 Transport Topics Top 50 Logistics providers list and is among the most active in designing supply chains that combine online and brick-and-mortar inventories to give customers more options about where and when they buy goods.

Stores will become fulfillment centers and places where customers can pick up or return goods purchased online, he said.

The size of stores will shrink as more inventory is kept at distribution centers for direct shipment to consumers, but the number of stores could expand exponentially as retailers use kiosks, social media outlets and mobile phones as "storefronts," Kelleher said.

Howard S. Abramson

A good example of this is Best Buy Co. The Minneapolis-based electronics retailer is closing 50 of its largest stores, while at the same time expanding the number of mobile sites where customers can access store inventory and buy online.

"The shopping experience is moving to the distribution center from the store," said Ken Kellaway, chairman of E-Fill America, Randolph, Mass., a company that manages a group of independently owned warehouses in the United States.

Buying and selling on the Internet means customers could be located anywhere in the world, and that is creating demand for a new kind of logistics service to deal with distribution and payment issues across borders.

A three-year-old company in Burlington, Mass., I-Parcel, for instance, arranges for international delivery of goods purchased online for Toys R Us and other retailers.

Another company, FiftyOne Global Ecommerce, based in New York City, specializes in helping U.S. retailers sell their products abroad by handling customs clearance and overseeing local delivery and payment.

The company has attracted $12.5 million in investment capital this year and has opened operations in Toronto and Dublin, Ireland.

Out of all of this will come a new way of doing business for retailers, for manufacturers and for logistics companies.
